

I am not in favour of the early intervention for young children. I tender my objection as a mother who has given birth to and successfully raised 5 children. Children are best under the care of loving parents, people who understand them and give them good nutrition, and proper hours of sleep, play, learning and love. Obviously children have emotions same as adults do. They are usually happy but something can upset them and they can also express they displeasure with something. Non of these things are hard to handle.

There is no such things as prevention of mental health.

Young children don't need to be interfered with particularly with drugs which should be kept for sever or emergency measures.

Proper parenting is the basis for a well adjusted child. Maybe their should be more information available on correct parenting.